Paul Taylor, Senior Instructor, Force Science Institute

Paul L. Taylor is a Senior Instructor and Course Coordinator for the Force Science Institute. He is also a PhD Candidate at the University at Albany, State University of New York where he studies police decision making and human error within the context of use-of-force encounters. He currently serves as a subject matter expert, instructor, and curriculum adviser for law enforcement training at the National Center for Security & Preparedness at the University at Albany. He is also the Managing Editor for Justice Quarterly, a top ranked academic journal in the field of criminal justice.

Paul has over ten years of practical law enforcement experience including time as a department training manager, patrol sergeant, field training officer, and use-of-force instructor. This experience includes training budget management, curriculum and training program development, and the management of departmental training records for state approval and audit. Paul is a Colorado POST certified train-the-trainer and has developed and delivered law enforcement instruction for academy, field training, and advanced in-service audiences as well as graduate and undergraduate level courses in both classroom and online formats. He is actively engaged in law enforcement research and training across the United States and regularly presents at both academic and practitioner conferences.
